February 2008

By Elektra Luxx

Upon meeting Derek Noble you immediately sense that he is a modest and real guy, the kind that looks you in the eye when talking. Something hard to come by these days. Though he doesn't readily say much, there's a sense of complexity behind his eyes that you will have to dig to get to. He stands over six feet but his posture carries like a feather and his bald head is balanced by a full bush of a blond beard.

Noble's artistic career started at the end of his learning career. Not being much of the studious collegian, Noble spent much of his college career playing college football at the UW. He later turned to the arts when looking for his adult calling.

Noble started tattooing four and a half years ago and painting with watercolors four years ago. He started painting with Crayola paints but moved onto more uppity paints, although he claims it's pretty much all the same stuff.

Trying to explain Noble's style is like trying to explain the basics of life: desire and death, blood and beauty, these types of things. These globally overused but always appealing motifs flow through all of his paintings like the hair of a rotting corpse, embracing his somewhat simplistic designs of the female body, horses, and the like. The layouts of his paintings are beautifully proportioned and often wrapped in undemanding but fantastical backgrounds that pull you in when you least expect them to.

Noble hits the aesthetic idea of simple beauty right on the head in his paintings, and though you can recognize the direct influence of his tattoo career in most of his work, it doesn't overpower or take away any aesthetic value. Instead, it adds to it. It's like some Mayan king who sheds blood before the multitude by piercing his own penis and drawing a thin reed through it three times, exhibiting the shamanistic ability to contact the undead. Or not. What is especially interesting in Noble's work is that nothing is lost in the curvilinear-to-flat surface transfer, and the 3-D feel births into some other beast in his paintings that gives his tattoo work a regal reflection.

Though it took a couple beers and some directionless wandering around Capitol Hill, I eventually milked some basic info about painting out of this shy guy's brain:

Tell me all about the horses. Horses are just really cool animals. My grandfather was a painter and he painted a lot of horses. I have a couple of those paintings and I think that kind of inspired me. Horses have a really cool-looking skull, too.

Do you think some of your paintings of dead girls are erotic? I don't know, maybe. The girls' tits are usually showing and I try to make them look pretty. I don't know if

I would call them erotic. I hope they are more creepy than erotic. I think ghostly women are super-creepy. In ghost stories and legends there is always a really sad or scary reason that the female ghost is haunting a place.

Who are your top two influences and why?

I'm influenced by all kinds of people and all kinds of music...also horror movies. I can tell you my favorite artist is Hussar; that guy's stuff is awesome. Sometimes, I stare at his paintings and they totally inspire me to create something. The other biggest influence is metal, of all sorts; all that is heavy!

Tell me some stories behind your dead girls; are they based off of heartbreak or something else? They aren't based on anything. I started painting them because I thought it was a cool contrast—beauty and gore, together. I think in their different stages of mutilation they seem to have a story behind them, like the aftermath to a scene in a horror movie. Then people started asking me to paint them and tattoo them, so I did, and I'm kind of sick of doing them (but not totally sick yet).

Do you like tattooing or painting better?

That's a hard one. I love painting because I can do whatever I want, in my studio, by myself. I like being alone. Tattooing is great because it is such a social job and I get to meet some really great people. I get to travel a little bit too, and that's fun. It pays my bills.

What do you think sets your style apart from others? I don't know. I think the people around you dictate whether you have a style or not, so I'm not the person to know.

What are your feelings about cannibal fetishism? It's pretty fucking weird to me! Wanting to eat someone or be eaten is just about as strange as it gets.

Noble just moved to Seattle and is currently inking at Lucky Devil on Capitol Hill. Stop by and get a tattoo. He's got my recommendation and I'm sure yours after you see some of his paintings. His expansion into other mediums includes a recent board for TnS Skateboard. You can also check out and order prints from his online gallery of paintings at www.dereknoble.fatzombie.com.

Looking back at my list of Exotic magazine interviews and band write-ups, I notice that I tend to focus strictly on bands with gimmicks or bands without instruments, and I'm sure that this is not helping my reputation as a "music" columnist. With all due respect to artists mentioned thus far, I feel as if it is time to step up my game and introduce readers to artists that are not only gimmick-free, but able to play musical instruments as well. Don't fret, though. This month's batch of featured artists is full of triple-penetration, illicit substances, and B-movie samples. After working a recent concert, I was digging through a merch box and I noticed a stack of CDs that didn't belong to any of the bands on the bill. Here's a tip for would-be promoters: sneaking shit into the equipment and/or merch storage of your favorite band is a more effective method of promotion than soliciting your material directly. Simply on the WTF factor, I opened up a copy of Overlook the Ambush, Mliotta's debut LP, and gave it a listen. Almost immediately, I was reminiscing of late 80s/early 90s pre-grunge industrial (Pigface, Killing Joke, Mind-era Ministry, etc.), tongue-in-cheek lo-fi alternative (Ween, Fugazi, Butthole Surfers), and every garage band that's ever managed to play decent songs without losing the signature "grandma's basement" sound.

Giving the liner notes a brief look, I noticed the name Marcus and remembered that the drummer from Love Meter (also named Marcus) had been fucking with the merch booth at the previous night's show. Figuring that this dude played drums for Mliotta, I took a closer look at the album to notice that Marcus not only does drums, but guitar, bass, vocals, sampling, keyboards, production and mastering. Again riding the WTF factor for all it was worth, I noticed (and no offense is meant by this) that the drums on the Mliotta album are its least appealing aspect. A solo effort in the style of Nine Inch Nails, Overlook the Ambush is surprisingly diverse and consistently entertaining. Remember when industrial music sampled things other than George W. speeches? Mliotta combines this genre with a loosely organized indie/garage/lo-fi sound that leans more toward the Pigface end of the spectrum and less toward electro-rock like KMFDM. Fans of alternative, industrial, punk, indie, and rock in general will find Overlook to be a refreshing substitute for mediocre local attempts in similar genres.

If you are a fan of KMFDM-inspired electro-industrial that uses more Bush samples than a lesbian taste test, Ikonoklast is right up your alley. I was introduced to the band when I showed up alongside no more than fifteen other people to see them live at Rock 'n' Roll Pizza. Normally, a band that is stuck with a Tuesday gig in Gresham might not give the best performance (I speak from experience). Ikonoklast, on the other hand, performed as if they were in front of an arena-sized crowd. Too often, industrial "bands" consist of a sampler and two really really white thirty-something guys in leather pants. Ikonoklast not only plays all of the standard instruments (including a real drum set), but they have an actual keyboardist as well. Although the previous statement might not sound that exciting to the casual music fan, industrialites are probably cumming in their pants by now. To make things even better, Ikonoklast's chugga-chugga style of industrial rock seems to represent what could have come from the late-90s era of guitar-laced rivet rock, an honest tongue-in-cheek approach to a typically overconfident and cliché genre. Not taking themselves too seriously while avoiding run-of-the-mill industrial music lyrics, Ikonoklast should appeal to even the most jaded industrial fan.

At this point, I'm opting against another paragraph about who plays what and how long the band has been together (you can get all that shit on the band's website) and instead focusing on an Ikonoklast side project that will hopefully fit this month's Valentine's Day theme more appropriately than Ikonoklast does. Ladies and gentlemen, I present to you Reburn and the Skidmarks, punk rock's answer to David Allen Coe. "Do the Math," arguably Reburn's best song, instantly catches the listener and has him or her singing along...about triple penetration. If you take the average Rancid song, replace redundant guitar rhythms with a slightly more complex Southern-rock sound, and hop the lead singer up on cheap speed, you have Reburn. Citing influences from Jenna Jameson, Slayer, Traci Lords, Mr. Bungle, Taylor Rain and Willie Nelson, Reburn and the Skidmarks are sure to entertain the sleaziest of strip club patrons. After all, they don't have a lead singer...they have a "Pussy Destroyer." And you wonder why your band isn't getting a write-up.

OK, so you might not want a lo-fi experimental album, and you've heard enough Combichrist to kill your desire for alt-industrial, and for whatever reason, you're not a fan of pornographic punk rock. For all you legitimate music snobs out there, a local band called Fluid comes to the rescue. Immediately reminiscent of Tool and somewhat similar to Thirty Seconds to Mars and Chevelle, Fluid is a well-produced, extremely talented band that will no doubt be added to "stripper folders" on house computers the minute the band gets some attention from a decent distributor. Unlike the influences cited previously, Fluid does not suffer from over-compressed production (i.e., TSTM's The Kill, where you can't tell the guitar from the vocals), overly extended tracks, or lyrical repetitiveness. What the band brings to the table aside from accessibility and production quality is a sense of hope for the progressive-rock genre. With no gimmicks, no spiffy logos, and virtually no digitally enhanced vocals or background effects, I will not be the least bit surprised if Fluid leaves a large dent on the music scene within the next year, if not month.

UNDERGROUND

I've spent my life speaking my mind and as a result, offending the fuck out of people.

My primary purpose is never to offend, but that's always the collateral damage. The problem is that my honest opinions always turn out to be highly offensive to 99 percent of the public. And I realize that the offended groups are often well-organized, psychotic, or, worst of all, well-organized and psychotic. But that has never deterred me from opening my yap and talking shit.

In the course of a long, dubious career of shit-talking, my thin Caucasian lips have never feared flinging feces at anyone.

Anyone except the Masons.

I'm not a superstitious man, but something happened nearly a dozen years ago that made me afraid to ever shit-talk the Masons in public discourse or even in private thought.

It was the morning of July 4th, 1996—exactly two hundred and twenty years since our noble, wig-wearing forefathers (many of whom were Masons) signed the Declaration of Independence and told England to blow them.

It's hard to think of a day with more political significance to Americans. Maybe 9/11 can compete in terms of importance, but July 4th is a lot more fun. July 4th means hot dogs and watermelon and keg parties and the reckless igniting of multicolored incendiary devices.

As part of the research for a book I was writing, I was awake at 8:30 AM on that particular blindingly sunny and hot July 4th, interviewing an expert on so-called "indentured servitude"—a pretty name for white slavery—in the early American colonies.

At the time, I had the bad judgment to be living in the mossily self-righteous town of Portland, Oregon. I was conducting the interview by phone. My interviewee lived in the mighty-whitey town of Coeur D'Alene, Idaho.

Apart from possessing a near-frightening amount of knowledge regarding slavery in the early American colonies, he also claimed to be an expert in the arcane history and alleged evil machinations of Freemasonry—specifically reputed Masonic-directed assassinations such as JFK's.

At the time, I knew nothing of the Masons except that they were allegedly very powerful, secretive, and that something like every president besides Kennedy and Reagan had been a member. Those things alone made the Masons scary.

During the course of our conversation, the topic drifted to a friend of mine who had recently posed in an authentic vintage Masonic costume in some gay-ass San Francisco satirical magazine.

DON'T FUCK WITH THE MASON

THEY FUCK BACK HARDER

"He never should have done that," my interviewee warned gravely. "You don't EVER mess with or make fun of the Masons. They take these sort of things far more seriously than you can imagine. They will retaliate against him. It will be swift, final, and on a day with heavy political significance."

Very well, I thought to myself. You're out of your fucking mind.

Six hours later...

Let me repeat that...

Only SIX HOURS LATER, the friend in question was over the river from Portland in Vancouver, WA, buying himself some firecrackers.

It was, after all, July 4th—a day with undeniably "heavy political significance" for Americans.

Suddenly, right at the firecracker stand, my friend was stricken with a violent seizure that knocked him to the ground. I heard it took a half-dozen men to restrain him and shlep him to the hospital.

We weren't sure whether he was going to live or die for a full week, but he finally pulled out of his coma and was sent, against his wishes, to a psychiatric hospital. He would remain a ward of the state, forbidden to move around at will, for something like the next six weeks.

I visited him in the mental ward. It was the type of place where the security guards have to click open the electronic door before you can enter. The door is like that, of course, to keep the cuckoo birds from flying out. When I walked back to my friend's little hospital bed, he was wearing a white gown. It was sad to behold. He was easily one of the smartest people I knew, and I feared that half of his brain had been knocked out by whatever happened on July 4th.

Over ten years later, he seems as if his mental functioning is completely restored. But doctors were unable to determine what happened to him that day. There were other factors that could have contributed to a seizure—things such as the fact that he was a diabetic addicted to smoking the big "H" who had recently suffered water on the brain when he was sent hurtling through his pickup truck's front window during an accident. Any one of those factors, or a combination, could have contributed to a sudden seizure and subsequent hospitalization.

But it's hard to think it wasn't the Masons.

So I'm here before the world to declare for the record that I got absolutely NO BEEF with the Masons. Hey, Masons—even if you sent high-tech brain-debilitating sonic waves to punish my friend straight into a coma, that's what he deserves for publicly disrespecting your noble legacy.

Shit—I hope that the fact I'm even talking about any of this doesn't offend them.

I'm going to be tense as fuck for the next six hours.
