THE P-TOWN HAPS

Once again, your favorite column has been scrunched into a third of its normal size. Fear not, my loyal readership; I'm happy to report that it's due to space issues and not any nefarious scribbling on my part. So please, no fracasos or furors—Erotic City will be back to its full grandeur soon!

Now that everyone's at ease, let's jump into it—we have a lot to cover! Let's start October off right, with Jessica's 21st birthday party on Friday, October 7, at Guilty Pleasures! Happy Birthday, Jessica! If you don't wake up wearing your dinner, you failed your mission! While we're on the birthday topic, we have a few more this month... On Wednesday, October 12, at Hawthorne Strip, Bunni will be throwing her "Birthday Hoedown," which I trust will live up to its name! Happy Birthday, Bunni! Our last birthday of the month is back at Guilty Pleasures on Friday, October 28—Happy Birthday, Katana!

Our next announcement is bittersweet. Riverside Corral will celebrate their 29th Anniversary on Saturday, October 29. Fucking sweet, right? Now for the bitter... It's their 29th and final anniversary. Folks, to put it in perspective for you, Riverside Corral opened during Bill Clinton's first term in office, and the same year the first issue of Exotic was printed. You've had one hell of a three-decade run, Mike! Congratulations, and we'll be there in support!

It's been three years since the industry has had an adult-themed haunted house, but the wait is finally over. That's right, folks. From the twisted mind of DJ Dick Hennessy comes a Halloween experience so terrifying and sexy it could only take place in Portland! Opening night is Thursday, October 13, at Guilty Pleasures, and it runs through Monday, October 31 (see page 34 for the full schedule). Don't sleep on this, peeps—we've already seen some of the ghastly setup, and it's definitely going to live up to its name!

MISS EXOTIC 2023

The industry's largest event of the year, Miss Exotic Oregon 2023, kicks off on Friday, October 7, at Kit Kat Club! Come support your favorite industry entertainers! Please see all the October dates to the right, in red—we expect your perfect attendance!

See you there, Good Sirs and Mesdames!

Support your local businesses, including every industry business within these pages.

THREE CHAOTIC, EVIL GIMMICKS YOUR BAND CAN DO FOR A HALLOWEEN SHOW

By Blazer Sparrow

Going through my files, I realize this is my fifth Halloween-themed piece for Exotic. You're welcome in advance for all of the solid gold content I've delivered without interruption. If you think my outlandish suggestions over the years for fun-filled Halloween high jinks have been nothing but satire not to be taken literally, you, sir or ma'am, are reading the wrong nudie mag. The boobs in these pages are for entertainment, but the writing is hard-hitting journalism and academia that should absolutely be taken seriously. Do you know the sheer number of minutes Wombstretcha the Magnificent pours into researching his pieces?! Minutes upon minutes on Wikipedia.

Now that we got that little misunderstanding out of the way, I'm here to, once again, give you based boob enjoyers some free ideas to spice up your untalented and unsuccessful band's inevitable Halloween show. Honestly, the best thing you can do is not play in some house with a sweaty, centipede-infested basement on Halloween...that no one is gonna show up to anyway. Kids today want Ketamine and dubstep, not PBR and guitars. Quit now, before you get too old to fake your way into a shitty office job.

However, if you insist on doing yet another Samhain-themed performance in some living room or tiny bar to bring back a fraction of the happiness you felt as a child trick-or-treating, try out some of these delightfully devious ideas to make your little shindig more appealing than your average drug'n'bass-fueled costume orgy. See, anyone can wrangle some MDMA and barely-dressed femme presenters, but these three stellar ideas are going to give your poor party guests a night to remember—for better or worse.

Again, super serious, non-satirical ideas.

Play Your Normal Set But Do Ska Versions Of All Your Songs!

You read that right. Since the dreaded MTV Unplugged series, every goddamn metal, punk and rock-act-too-loud-for-your-Grandma-to-enjoy thinks it's totally fine to play a "stripped down, acoustic" set of their songs. The same songs that we really only listen to so we can scream along with the singer as he grabs the back of our heads and smashes them into each other in the pit. It's been done. Also, it's so lazy. Plebs will think it's a genius reworking of heavier songs showing impressive musical prowess, but all you're doing is playing the same fucking riff on an acoustic guitar. Child's play. Now, rewriting your songs with upstrokes on the guitars and only hitting the snare's rim...that's impressive. Clearly, everyone needs fedoras, suspenders, Doc Martens, and at least one checkered item of clothing. If you know someone who plays trumpet or trombone, bring them in. And if you don't, just have one of your friends wing it. It can't be hard. You just blow, right? There are no downsides to this idea. Everyone will love it.

That fourth wave of ska is just around the corner. You might as well get on it before everyone else does.

Go Halloween Caroling!

Or whatever the equivalent would be. I'm sure there's some ancient Samhain tradition that involved traveling and singing songs at neighbors in exchange for stuff. Most pre-Christian European holidays always involved getting drunk and going door-to-door, singing at people. This seemed to be their favorite pastime, as they found an excuse to do it at every turn. Stupid Jesus, once again, ruining everything. Either way, we've carried on this tradition in the modern, sanitized version of trick-or-treating. I mean, seriously. We keep celebrating Halloween as adults 'cause of those memories of dressing up, going on an adventure with friends, and getting things from strangers, being pretty much the most awesome thing ever. Let's not tarnish that memory by throwing a lame party with your lame band playing. Take your band and your party out on the streets and sing your lame-ass songs at each of your neighbors' doors. Loudly and drunkenly. Instead of candy, demand more beer for your merrymaking. If they refuse, set fire to their lawn and place curses on their family. Move on to the next house, rinse and repeat. There are zero downsides to this idea. You'll be keeping ancient traditions alive while giving your fans an experience they'll never forget.

Recreate An Authentic Grateful Dead Show Complete With Nonconsensual Dosing!

It has become a tired trope on Halloween—bands doing an entire set as a different band. Usually, one more famous and from times past. Since this overplayed gimmick has been done to death, you will have to go a step further (see what I did there) in order to make it an event that will stand out. There are more Grateful Dead tribute bands in the little town of Eugene, OR, than there are stars in the galaxy. This is not a difficult sound to recreate. Just do drugs and noodle way longer than necessary. And there's a built-in audience. You're little house show will be packed to the brim with unemployed, obnoxious boomers who refuse to let go of the past. But, you'll do one better than all your other costumed contemporaries. That keg everyone's been pulling from will have been spiked with a heroic dose of the highest-grade acid you can find. Just as the actual band did in 1969, to the entire audience and crew for their Playboy After Dark special for CBS, you will be recreating a real, live Grateful Dead gimmick from the boomers' favorite nostalgia-tainted era. They always bitch and moan how music was better then, and it was a different time, and how kids today can't blah blah blah. Well, time to give them what they want. An invasive and horrific experience forced upon them against their will, out of sheer selfish desire for shits and giggles. Can you think of a more authentic experience for popular music's most insufferable fanbase? I sure can't. For the truly chaotic evil, I suggest dimming the lights, hitting the strobe light and smoke machine, and slowly starting to play more out of key and off tempo as the night progresses. Subtly put on terrifying masks and invite friends to start walking amongst the audience in lizard costumes. By Samhain's end, these old blowhards will burn every Grateful Dead record they have and never speak of the band again. After a couple of years of these little Halloween parties up and down the west coast, we just might wipe out the last remnants of this fandom that just won't die.

Zero downsides.

Sona Samhain! May the Old Gods reign again soon!

IT'S Spooky SEASON

Oct2022

A NO-GOOD, VERY BAD DAY

THE WORST POSSIBLE TIMES TO HAVE BEEN ALIVE

BY ESMERALDA RUPP-SPANGLE

Boy, we sure have been having a fun decade so far, haven't we? Fires, pandemics (plural, oh boy!), war, inflation, Betty White dying, bizarre political upheaval and instability, environmental collapse, the erosion of human rights, drought, flooding, Jared Leto getting his own superhero movie—the list goes on. It's been...a challenging time for all of us. However, something that can be incredibly cathartic during these times of travail and suffering is to reflect on how much worse it really could be—and believe it or not—it sure could be a lot worse.

On that note, here is a wildly incomplete breakdown of some of the times and places on earth it would suck way, way worse to be than the here and now.

1816, Mostly Everywhere

Known colloquially as “The Year Without a Summer,” this period in history was as miserable as it was unpreventable. Likely caused by the eruption of Mt. Tambora in the Dutch East Indies in 1815, this super shitty year was marked by massive crop failure, extreme cold, and no hot summer fashions to speak of. Huge floods in China, famine across large swaths of the world, and accompanying pestilence all joined hands and set aside their differences to make this time on Planet Earth a bummer for everyone. This boiled down to what's known as a “volcanic winter,” when all the little ash particles and shit band together in harmony and blot out the sun. It kills plants, brings snowstorms in July, chokes waterways with sludge, and if you breathe it, makes you sound like Magda from the dive bar, who smokes two packs of non-filters a day, and calls you “honey” in a way that's both endearing and somehow really unsettling. So, kind of like the PNW every summer now, only with more snow and less fire.

1340s, Genoa

On what is now the northwestern coast of Italy used to be a small nation known as Genoa. Local Genoese Christians and Mongol traders had managed to establish a tense sort of peace, as the small nation had become an eclectic trading hub between the east and west—a wacky mix of folks from all over, coming from nowhere and going wherever. Think Casablanca meets Tatooine meets a Chinese takeout place in Mexico City. Whatever, it was bustling. Well, as you might expect them to do, tensions rose as word of the new plague started circulating, and as you might expect, people started pointing fingers. The first and easiest to blame have always been “those fucking foreigners!” (Not Foreigner, though, because we all want to know what love is, don't we?) One thing led to another, and after a series of reciprocal murders, the Mongols were asked not so nicely to GTFO. In predictable fashion, hit fit the shan, and after an extended siege, the beleaguered Mongols started succumbing to this new plague (possibly, but not definitively proven to be “black plague,” or yersinia pestis, if you're a nerd like me). Because they were understandably pretty fuckin' pissed at this point, the Mongols started catapulting the bodies of their dead into the walled city. This may be the oldest use of germ warfare ever recorded; though they may not have known they were introducing disease into the city, it may have just been more of a “Bless your heart, here are some rotting corpses to enjoy.” We'll never know, but it certainly did the trick because, after this point, the plague spread across the whole of Europe like, well...the plague. The rest is a flea-ridden history.

79 AD, Pompeii/Herculaneum

Another volcano one, I know, I know. Think of it, though, the well-respected author, naturalist, and philosopher, Pliny the Elder, pulls up in his boat to the fancy resort town of Herculaneum as pumice begins to rain from the sky. In what may be some ill-spoken last words after some level of hesitation was expressed from the crew, he says, “Fortune favors the bold; steer to where Pomponianus is.” Yeah, he was kind of a fatty, with what we'd probably now call asthma, and died shortly thereafter from the toxic off-gasses of the first pyroclastic flow that enveloped them. His nephew, Pliny the Younger, managed to avoid the whole dying thing, and his words remain as the most verbose and florid descriptions of the havoc that Mt. Vesuvius wreaked:

“Wow, that sucked,” he is quoted as saying.

Others were less fortunate and died in the hellish bombardment of ash and liquid rock raining from the sky. Most famously, the Pompeii bodies bear silent testament to the sudden and catastrophic hellscape their world turned into in an instant. Most especially, this body transformed instantly into ash, then buried under detritus and soot—preserved for eternity, making the best of a bad time.

Runners Up:

536+ AD — Named by medieval historian

~66 MYA, Yucatán Peninsula

Yeah, okay, I get it; there weren't any people 66 million years ago, sure. That doesn't mean it wouldn't have fucking suuuucked to look up in the sky, see a streak of fire, and then suddenly be consumed by a raging inferno from the vacuum of space. This was—if you remember anything at all from middle school science class—the bar-thirty for dinosaurs. Wham, bam, thank you, ma'am.

For many years, scientists assumed that dinosaurs were basically not fucking enough, which is why they died. Yeah, okay, guys, whatever. Anyhow, Luis and Walter Alvarez (nerd fact: a father and son duo—the elder of whom helped design the A-Bomb) realized that this was a load of horse hockey and proposed the idea of a huge fucking meteor. Scientists scoffed at them for years, but history has proven they were 100% correct, as evidenced by a ring of beautiful cenotes around where the meteor struck; subterranean caves, whose sandy guts were turned into liquid glass and propelled into the sky, only to come drizzling back down in a torrential downpour of absolute shittiness.

This asteroid absolutely obliterated life in the region, but if you weren't killed by the firestorms, liquid glass rain, or shock wave, you'd have almost certainly perished in the environmental devastation that followed. Tight.

Michael McCormick as “the worst year to be alive,” this time was a Venn diagram of horrible things: a volcanic winter that plunged most of Europe into the coldest decade in thousands of years, social and civil unrest, and the first outbreaks of the Plague of Justinian (bubonic plague) in Rome in 541, which would go on to devastate for hundreds of years to come.

2016 — David Bowie died. Fuck you, God.

1918 — During WWI, The Spanish Flu killed more people, all told, than the war itself, but we've kind of been through this shit by now, so suck it up, buttercups.

This is only a small glimpse of the awful times life has been through (and lived through!) on this planet. Somehow, life keeps chugging along and occasionally finding ways to make the best of things (cheese fries, naps, cuddly pets, a fat bowl, boobs—a few of my favorite things). Just because things might seem dark now doesn't mean they can't get better—or worse—depending on how you look at it.

Esmeralda Rupp-Spangle derives joy from nihilism, somehow. She can be found on Facebook as Esmeralda Marina or Instagram as @esmeraldasilentcitadel if you feel like throwing rotten tomatoes or asteroids at her.

FRIENDLY HAUNTS

BY HANNAH ONE CUP

It is October. Much like the fictional character Dwight Schrute from The Office, I am just stating a fact. It is that time of year when you purposely go into houses that claim to have murderous ghosts in them, just for fun. You might choose to wear your sluttiest Peanuts character outfit this month or purchase all of the pumpkin spice creamer the store has. (You know who you are; I watched you do it, lady. Big Karen move on your part.)

For me, this time of year usually means lots of smelly candles and corn mazes and trips around the countryside to watch the trees change colors (yes, all of you casting the first stone out there, I do these things). But this year, I find myself “in-between” houses, which means I get to put all of my normal Halloween goodness and light into the folks around me. I visited old haunts. Sometimes that can be scary in and of itself, depending on how you had left that haunt those years ago.

I thought I would do a dedication to what I feel certain types of people at these haunts would be like if they were ghosts. This list will speak to almost anyone; you’ll all be able to say, “that is definitely you,” and if you’re lucky to find yourself seeing all-too specific details in this list, you might just have been the muse I used for the description. Let’s just see!

The Uncle Dad

The Uncle Dad, when alive, is that guy that everyone goes to when they’re having a problem of some sort, and they’re going to try to fix it. Whether that’s with duct tape and a makeshift arm cast or giving you directions for how to get places (while giving you history on every building in between), The Uncle Dad is filled with some sort of knowledge. It’s never known if it’s useful knowledge, but it’s there, and when they disperse it, know that you are in safe hands. Like Allstate. This dude, when in ghost form, is seen more as a poltergeist. They’re constantly watering your plants, moving your keys you swear were missing to where they are “supposed to be” (usually by the front door). They’re just generally helpful, and it’s really annoying because you swear you’re just going bat-shit crazy after the second time of knocking over that beer you ordered but apparently didn’t need. Thanks, Uncle Dad. Guess I’ll go home now.

The Best Friend

This is the individual in your life you trust with your deepest, most intimate secrets, hopes, and dreams. This is also the friend you feel completely comfortable yelling at in public because they are more than likely about to do something extraordinarily stupid. But honestly, this is why you are best friends. Your ride or die, and the person that doesn’t have a problem telling you no or swatting you upside the head when you’re less than personable to those around you (I’m sure this has never happened to any of you before. You’re always at your best in strip clubs and bars, right?). As a ghost, this person is likely to haunt you in your waking hours as an internal monologue and general feeling of unease. That gut feeling you get that tells you not to eat cheese even though you really want it, but you’re lactose intolerant? That’s Linda. Sure, your gut may literally be saying, “Please, please, no. Please don’t eat that block of cheese.” But Linda is the one jabbing your gut and loudly whispering in your head, “Don’t fuckin’ do it, bitch. You know you’ll regret it.” We love and hate Linda, because Linda is always right, whether we want them to be or not.

Your Mom

Your mom can be anyone in your life that gives you that maternal feeling of warmth, acceptance, judgment, shame, and love. This may not be your biological mother; it could be your best friend’s mom, your grandma, your favorite older bartender, or that stripper you question whether they’re about to retire next year or not. At the end of the day, this person is there for you. They will listen to your stories of woe or happiness, sometimes—many times—interrupting in between to give their side stories from “back in the day.” Mom has no problems telling you what’s what, will give you that look of disappointment when you say something they disagree with, and will get up and leave if you don't want to listen to them. Just like they did that one time they left you at the grocery store when you were 8. When Mom turns into an apparition, and you bring someone into the house that they disapprove of, they will physically show it. That semi-decent bottle of wine you had waiting to be opened tonight? It just so happened to want to slam itself onto the wood floor, breaking glass and spilling red wine everywhere. Even if you don't take that as the hint, and you bring this person into the bedroom, Mom's going to show their disdain for this person by pulling on their hair and slapping their face. Yeah, try getting that person to come back to bed with you after that. Thanks, Mom.

Dads

Dads, like moms, can be anyone that gives you a bristly, stern, hard-love, prideful, judgmental feeling. Mom and dads love to judge. They just lie about doing it. Dad may sometimes outweigh Mom when it comes to what you're decisions in life end up being and who's opinion you trusted more. Dad is usually simpler, as well, and easy to read. When Dad turns into a ghost, he's going to make sure he's constantly there watching over you from the recliner in your house. That time you swear you saw the chair rock and back forth, once? Yeah, that was ghost dad just wanting to join in and maybe change your TV channels once in a while to show sports. If your dad smoked, you'll most likely also smell the faint aroma of a cigar or cigarette smoke.

So there you have it. And I've been given this information from a reputable source (that psychic on SE 82nd near the taco stand and record store). When those close to you pass on, they never truly pass on. A part of them will always stay with you, whether you want them to or not (you're still feeling those judging eyes of mom on your back every time you even think of bringing Carlos back to the house). They are there for you through death and beyond. So, if you start feeling a sharp stab in your gut, maybe think twice before getting that dollar sushi from the food cart down the street. That might just be Linda warning you not to do that thing.

Hannah One Cup can be found claiming that they regret nothing while eating a bowl of macaroni and cheese and then regretting it thoroughly afterward. She's gone through 8 bottles of red wine and hasn't been able to have any "nighttime guests" in a long time. Invite her over sometime. She can be found on Facebook and around the corner.

THE WORLD'S MOST HORRIFYING FOODS

Since it is Halloween season, I am going to touch on something frightening, though not “monsters and murderers” kind of frightening. I have a special interest in food and cooking, and we will be discussing monsters indeed, but they are of a different kind than the ones that slaughter teenagers camping in the woods.

Those monsters: horrifying, disgusting foods.

I know you're thinking, “what makes a food horrifying and disgusting?”

After all, many people across the world eat many different things, and some folks eat things that we in the USA would think unconventional (or just plain nasty) as part of their daily lives. Hell, some people here eat Burger King.

To plumb the depths of disgust and horror, I will try to make sure that the problems with the food are due to their nature. I wish to pursue this topic without undue prejudice. I won't just be making fun of things because “haha, people in other countries eat weird shit.” No, the items I describe will be objectively terrible from the standpoint of what is in them or how they are made.

Anyhow, enough bullshit—on to the list.

Not ranked in any particular order.

1. Gomutra

It's cow piss. Yup, just straight-up cow piss from the sacred cows of India. It is bottled like a supplement you'd find at a fitness store and is touted for its therapeutic properties and many fine traits and values, but...at the end of the day, it's still just cow pee. And yeah, you are supposed to drink it.

I'm sitting here wondering, “Well, how do they obtain this? Is there a man with a tub who waits for the cow to take a whiz, and goes a-running to catch it, or some kind of cow-piss harvesting machine in play?” I have yet to find an answer to my inquiry on this.

For those who don't know, cows are sacred in Hindu culture, and they just move wherever they want. In the rural countryside, in the busiest cities—cows exist in the middle of everything. In my mental picture, I'm supposing there's some lonely dude watching and waiting for them to pee, and then when they do, jumping up and going for it, bringing his best whiz-catching bucket game.

2. Virgin Boy Eggs

This is a Chinese item prepared by the collection of young boys' pee...in which eggs are boiled. Yes, eggs boiled in child pee. It is sold by vendors as a delicacy. I am not sure what the fuck goes on in Chinese elementary schools, but apparently, some of it involves everyone peeing into a barrel. A barrel which, in Chinese fashion, is then sold to people who wish to make bizarre food. Why do both these first two things involve urine? I'm going to try to steer away from that.

3. Tongsul

This is Korean holistic medicine. There's no pee in it. There is poop, however. The way you make it is you have a small child between the age of 4 and 7 shit in a jar... and mix it with water and boiled rice.

Wrap it in a towel and have it ferment for a month, and bingo, there you have your tongsul. Ostensibly, it's good for the constitution and is said to cure all sorts of problems, from broken bones to epilepsy. If my doctor told me to drink child poop to cure a broken arm, I am fairly sure I'd tell that doctor to go to whatever hell they believe in. Then, if they don't believe in any hell, I'd probably just call 'em an asshole.

4. Kiviak

This is a thing from Greenland, so you know it's gonna be a horror. Kiviak is when you take an arctic seal, club it to death, cut its guts out, and fill the inside with hundreds of birds known as the Little Auk, or Alle Alle. You can only use this particular species of bird. Apparently, other species of birds don't work. Then, you stitch up the seal, cover it in grease, and bury it for between 3 to 18 months. Once the requisite time has passed, you open up ol' sealy, and take the birds out. They will, by this time, be fermented. The traditional way to consume them is to bite the heads off and suck out the juice within; the seal carcass is merely discarded.

I get it. Life in Greenland is hard, and you must make do with what you have, but I must wonder what prompted the first guy who said, "Let's stuff birds in a dead seal so we can suck out their bird juice next year," and I wonder what his friends said after that bomb dropped.

5. Su Callu Sardu

Hailing from Sardinia, a place where they seemingly sit around all day and eat terrifying things, comes Su Callu Sardu. This is somehow more horrifying than their famous maggot cheese (casu marzu) by an order of magnitude.

What is it, you ask?

It is when one takes a baby goat that just drank its mother's milk, slaughters it, and takes out its stomach, pours the milk through a filter, then puts the milk back in the stomach! You are supposed to pour it into the goat's fourth stomach, known as the abomasum, which contains rennet, a necessary enzyme used to make cheese. Afterward, you are supposed to seal up that stomach, cover it in salt, and let it hang out to dry for a few months. What a windchime that must be. Once it ripens, you slice the stomach, cut it into pieces, and serve the cheese which has been made (yes, with the stomach still on it), typically on pieces of rustic bread or deep-fried in lard. The taste has been described as a mixture of ammonia, candle wax, and gasoline.

6. Bävnergäll

It's pronounced "bawver yall" and means "beaver bark," which is bark in the sense of a dog's bark, not a tree's bark, and involves castoreum. It also would be a great Nordic death metal band name.

Castoreum is horrifying enough as is. It's a substance squeezed from the anal glands of a beaver. If you're over 30, then you've probably had it without realizing it, as it's been used for decades as a vanilla or raspberry flavoring agent until food scientists developed better artificial flavors, which don't require a beaver's ass to be part of them.

Yeah, about those raspberry Dum-Dums we got when trick-or-treating in 1985... Hate to break it to you, but we all ate beaver butt sauce in sucker form. Also, ladies, be mindful. They use castoreum to manufacture perfumes to this day.

However terrible that whole business sounds, the Swedes were big fans of the stuff and said to themselves, "I would like more, and I would like to drink it." Thus, they came up with the idea to take out the beaver's anal glands, dunk 'em in booze, soak them for a few months, then drink the schnapps that resulted. It's been described as simultaneously tasting like pine trees, leather, and beaver piss. Damn, Sven.

That's my list for now. Plenty of people eat plenty of terrible foodstuffs, so there may be more in the future.

I think I'm just gonna have a bowl of tomato soup, a sandwich, and I will try to forget about these things.

Eat well, and enjoy life.
